Historical facts about the Steinesmühle

The Steines

"If you follow the course of the weather from the south of Münster, you come to a short valley called the Steines. (...) In 1906, it was still a quiet, idyllic spot of land with slopes that were close together. The boundary to the north was formed by a steep slope strewn with huge boulders, on which juniper bushes, dog roses, heather and lush green grass grew - an ideal grazing area, which the shepherd visited almost daily with his herd. At the top of the slope, the country road from Münster to Nieder-Bessingen, lined with a row of poplars, ran the Laubach - Lich road. A path branched off here, which delighted many a hiker with its beautiful view of the Steines valley."

The Steinesmühle is first mentioned in court documents dating back to 1602. These documents contain rulings on the lawful distribution of water use at the time and the correct interpretation of the water rights of the surrounding mills on the Eschersbach and Wetter. At that time, there countless mills along the streams that competed for the shared water. Some of the mills still exist today. However, only traces or indications of others can still be found. It can be assumed that the mill mentioned at the time must have been a single, simple mill building with outbuildings grinding flour. The expansion of the mill complex in its current square shape, however, can only be dated to the end of the Thirty Years' War (1618 -1648). To protect against marauding hordes and to secure the bridge at the confluence of the Wetter and Eschersbach rivers, the closed design was chosen, as it still exists almost completely today. In addition to the actual mill operation for grinding grain into flour, the water power was also used to operate a sawmill in a second building. This use continued until the first third of the 20th century. Parts of the main mill building, the mill itself and the sawmill itself were demolished and burnt down in the years after the Second World War. Part of the main mill building, which now houses the guest house, was rebuilt in the following years and the water power was only used to generate electricity. When, around 1966, the millrace began to carry less and less water due to sedimentation, the mill was no longer able to produce its own electricity. An electricity connection was provided by OVAG. Since 1978, the association "Soziale und pädagogische Maßnahmen Steinesmühle e.V." has used the premises of the mill building for its socio-educational work. When the groundwater level sank in 1985 due to blasting in the nearby quarry, the Steinesmühle was given access to the local water supply network.

Youthful memories

"For the boys of Münster, there was nothing better than letting tires hurtle down the northern slope [of the Stein] and watching them jump over boulders and land in the stream below. For hours they amused themselves with this game. Over and over again (...). On the opposite southern side of the valley, a long strip of meadow stretched along the Wetter river. In the background were spruce and beech trees - the so-called paper forest, through which, along the Papiergraben, a wonderful forest path led from the Steinesmühle at the entrance to the valley near Münster past the Papiermühle to Ober-Bessingen. A rock face along this path provided nesting opportunities for countless colorful kingfishers.
